The preceding chapters tell the story of the various forms of industrial betterment undertaken by industrialists employing all the way from 5 up to 210,000 Lkts on h. At this point I desire to supplement the working experience in factory, mill and workshop by the testimony of typical industrialists stating their attitude toward industrial betterment. This study shows that in many great movements extending over a territory so vast as the United States, and dealing with such a complexity of nationalities, racial conditions and social prejudices of both capital and labor, the failures have been comparatively few; it tells the story of the way in which the various forms of mutuality have lessened the elemental friction between the employer and the employed. The fact that employers of upwards of one and a half million people who have come within...
