Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: . recorded as doubtful in four cases, very unfavorable in eight, and utterly hopeless in six. The results of tuberculin therapy were surprisingly satisfactory in eight cases. A slight apparent benefit was observed in one. In another instance considerable improvement was noted during a period of two months, but this was followed by a rapid decline. A change for the worse was noted in three patients, while no appreciable effects were detected in five. Of the eight cases showing excellent results, five had previously exhibited a persistent decline, one slight improvement, and two no appreciable change. There developed a complete subsidence of fever, gain in weight, diminution of cough and expectoration, and lessening in the activity of the tuberculous process. In four cases out of this group there was a severe general reaction following the first few doses of tuberculin without subsequent recurrence. In six patients a general disturbance was recognized after each injection, while in eight there was no appreciable reaction. Two with tuberculous laryngitis displayed a pronounced local reaction, as well as one case with a tuberculous hip-joint. The results obtained in this group of cases are somewhat unique in view of the fact that the existence of fever is commonly regarded as a contraindication for the administration of tuberculin. It is impossible to describe satisfactorily in a few words the manner in which a favorable influence of the tuberculin has been apparent. An appreciable increase of weight and strength, with diminution of cough...
